He rejoiced at being enabled to come to the conclusion that he should not endanger either the Constitution or the Church, by removing, as Lord John Russell proposed, the disabilities of the Jews; and he rejoiced the more, because he felt that if ever there was a race of men to whom every Christian country owed reparation for the infliction of cruel wrongs and savage persecution, it was the Jews. He defied any man to read, without shuddering, the description of those persecutions in the early historians of our own country who were not Jews, but Christian Ecclesiastics. He quoted from Mr. Hume and Mr. Sharon Turner s History q/ England descriptions of them, which were perfectly appalling. Could we even be suprised, if, after being pressed down so long by persecution in this...
