The main body of the Prussian army (three corps, together 90, 000 men) thus found itself in position between Bry and Tongrines, at ten oclock on the morning of the 16th. Wellington, who believed Napoleon still at Paris, was not aware of his armys approach, until the news of the passage of the Sambre received at 5 P. M. , on the 15th at Brussels, while at a dinner; but the duke had forewarned his troops to hold themselves in readiness for the first signal, and he sent ofiicers in all directions to put them in motion. His left under the Prince of Orange, was in cantonments between Mons and Nivelles, and with its head-quarters at Braine le Comte; his right under General Hill, extended towards Ath. It was then only by a prodigy of activity that this extended line...
